Fourteen years before Peter Pan first trod the boards, his author published a novel. My Lady Nicotine isn't much of a novel - its origins as a series of essays for the St James's Gazette are only too clear - but it may be the only work of literature to take giving up smoking as its central theme. JM Barrie wrote it in his late 20s, when his career was taking off largely thanks to the intervention of the Gazette's editor, Frederick Greenwood, who steered his writing towards the folksy Scotchness that would make his name; and later break it, especially in Scotland. Barrie had been trying to make his living as a man of letters for several years (a book about early English satirical verse was one of his failed projects) when he hit on the idea of turning some of his beloved mother's early Victorian memories of Kirriemuir into a piece and posting it south. There had been many rejections of other pieces, but Greenwood wrote, "I liked that Scotch thing. Any more of those?"

My Lady Nicotine was published six years later, in 1890. It isn't particularly Scotch - no more Scotch than Peter Pan.

My Lady Nicotine is the first-person account of a man, "a bachelor drifting towards what I now see to be tragic middle age", who is told by his wife-to-be that he can have smoking or her but not both. The fact that he's given up smoking is made clear from the start and the narrative is retrospective: how he began to smoke, the pleasures and companionship of smoking, the addiction of smoking, and the struggle to stop smoking.
